

Learn How to Find, Apply To, and Pay for Your Best Matched College at Princeton Review's Free Getting In Seminar

Princeton Review Holds Greenville Getting In Seminar January 27, 2009, at Greenville Technical College

Greenville, SC, January 6, 2009 - With gas prices at record highs, prospective college students and their families may feel pressure to cut back their campus visits this year. With more pressure to research and evaluate colleges via other sources, The Princeton Review of the Carolina's has teamed with Clemson University's Office of Academic Excellence, Greenville Technical College Office of Diversity and Community Affairs and the Greenville office of Personal Pathways To Success to offer free Getting In Seminars to help students and their families learn how to find, apply to and pay for a college that's matched to each student's interests and skills.

The Princeton Review, a leading provider of test preparation and publisher of over 200 books on getting into college and graduate school, will be offering the free Getting In Seminar on Tuesday, January 27, 2009 from 6:30 PM - 8:30 PM in the Technical Resource Center Auditorium on the main campus of Greenville Technical College. Experts from The Princeton Review will explain admissions and financial aid deadlines, SAT and ACT testing dates and preregistration, schedules to meet and forms to complete for college admissions. Seating is limited, so please register at 1-800-2REVIEW, or on line at www.PrincetonReview.com/GettingIn

Guest speakers from The Princeton Review will lead students and their families through a month by month plan for the college admissions process.

Princeton Review's free Getting In seminars offer information and time lines to organize the college admissions process on a month by month basis. An admissions expert will advise students on the importance of six key criteria:

- Academics and Grade Point Average (GPA)
- Extra-curricular activities
- Standardized tests
- Recommendation letters
- The college essay
- Financial Aid

The Princeton Review is a New York City-based company known for its test-prep courses, education services, and books. It is not affiliated with Princeton University and not a magazine.
